Accurate calendars guarantee that: Employees receive their wages on the expected dates, reducing complaints and manual corrections. Because the calendar serves as a backbone for dozens of downstream processes, even a minor mistake can trigger a chain reaction of errors. Many planners default to a calendar that mirrors the calendar year (January â€“ December). While convenient, this creates a mismatch with the federal fiscal year, leading to misplaced pay dates and budget misreports. How to avoid it: Start by anchoring the first pay period on the first Monday after October 1. Then chart every subsequent period forward, confirming that the final period ends on or before September 30.
